Harry Potter is really smartâ€!.The photodetecting and recording of tonal and continuous-tone images in electrostatographic copying apparatus is well known. It is also known that by using photodetecting and recording apparatus the original can be scanned in darkness and a high quality reproduction of the original can be made without requiring the original to be illuminated for direct viewing. These devices include not only the well-known black and white copier but also color copiers, which are used to produce multiple color reproductions of the original. Such copiers include the tinted and the bisected color copiers. In tinted copiers color toner is applied to the electrostatically charged original and black toner is applied to the areas where the images of the black toner would otherwise be present. These tinted or split gray toner areas provide a color copy of the original. As is well known, the halftone images of an original are formed by a screen which is associated with the photodetecting and recording apparatus. The screen has a large number of picture elements. Generally, each toner applied by the photodetecting and recording apparatus is a halftone. That is, the halftone image produced by the toner applied to a given screen element is formed by the amount of toner applied to that element and is graded, from a minimum to a maximum, as the amount of toner applied to the element increases. Accordingly, the toner applied to the screen element is generally a gray tone, i.e., part of the gray tone appearing
