Randomized controlled trial to evaluate effects of a quality-control programme on depression after myocardial infarction. A randomized controlled trial was conducted to evaluate the effects of a quality-control programme for the recording and monitoring of mood during follow-up after a myocardial infarction. This programme consisted of two sessions/week performed by a doctor and a nurse who interactively discuss the patient's moods, accompanied by feedback. We evaluated effects in the overall sample, and separately for men and women, and for patients with or without depression at baseline. Records of patients with an uncomplicated myocardial infarction were audited before intervention (n = 127) and at 6-month follow-up (n = 143). Depression was evaluated using the MADRS, with severity graded on a 4-point scale. This was compared with self-reports of depressed mood from patients using a 3-point scale. At baseline, 75% of patients had at least one depressed mood rating and 42% of all mood ratings on MADRS were recorded by the doctor or nurse. Recording of mood ratings increased to 87% at 6-month follow-up. Amongst the male and female subsamples, effect sizes were 0.55 and 0.59, respectively. MADRS ratings were converted into the Hamilton depression score, and analysed in a similar manner, but the differences were smaller (0.31 and 0.35, respectively). In the pre-intervention study group, 40% of patients displayed an increase in Hamilton depression score and, of these, 69% were detected by MADRS ratings. The proportion of true positives was higher with MADRS ratings (82%) than with patient reports of depressed mood (65%). We conclude that recording of depressed mood is enhanced by providing feedback to doctors and nurses. Chick-fil-A made headlines earlier this week for fueling a nationwide debate over the company's values and support of anti-gay businesses like Fellowship of Christian Athletes and the Salvation Army. On Wednesday, founder S. Truett Cathy confirmed to The Huffington Post that the chicken sandwich chain does not discriminate against "anybody," adding that the company's support of these kinds of organizations was "a very, very difficult decision" he once made. "We serve everybody — blacks and whites and all kinds of people," Cathy said. "We are a restaurant, and we're a family restaurant. We want everybody to
