[Gamers.com] [www.gamers.com] My review: The Legend of Heroes: Trails of Cold Steel is by far the best RPG for the PSP ever made. Story: 10/10 (One of the best stories I've ever played) You play as Rean Schwarzer, a young man who was put in charge of the all-female Luval Camp Academy. After a series of events conspire to his imprisonment in a waterfall prison of a place called Elden. While there he meets up with a mysterious masked man who wields great power, and leads him through a war to save the world. The gameplay is identical to most role-playing games on the PS2, Nintendo Wii and Playstation Portable. The only real change from other RPG's on those systems is the touchscreen. We can use this to cast magic spells and move objects. In addition to that, there's a lot of classes to choose from, and not just your normal Soldier and Paladin. You can be a Black Knight, or even a Rogue, and there's a Warrior, Archer, Magician, Stunt Pilot, Dark Knight, and more. The classes are different enough to make it fun, but not much more than that. Graphics: 7/10 The graphics are great, but the once-per-day loading times can get annoying after a while. That said, the world of Trails of Cold Steel is absolutely beautiful, and each world has its own unique style to it. Sound: 10/10 (The soundtrack is excellent) The music in Trails of Cold Steel is brilliant. The game's opening theme is an amazing track that fits perfectly with the story being told, and every time you play the opening theme a new snippet of music plays, creating a completely new atmosphere every time. It's pretty hard to find a flaw with this soundtrack. Gameplay: 9/10 The gameplay is the best part of this game, besides the graphics. You play as Rean Schwarzer, a young man who was put in charge of the all-female Luval Camp Academy. You'll spend most of the game playing the races' version of chess, using your skills to fend off enemies, and defeat bosses. There's even missions you can take part in, where you get to choose your own classes and fight against other players. You won' bff6bb2d33

HBSC - Health Behaviours in School-aged Children questionnaire Objectives The use of academic and social resources differs between girls and boys; it is likely that these differences are associated with variation in the development of health behaviour. The survey research investigated factors that explain the variation in daily physical activity, fruit and vegetable consumption, smoking and alcohol consumption among school-age children. Results Physical activity was associated with age, socioeconomic status and alcohol use, and with weight perception in boys and with smoking behaviour in girls. Fruit and vegetable consumption in the past week was not independently associated with any of the factors studied. Smoking behaviour varied in relation to school year, socioeconomic status, children's body mass index, weight perception, and mother's own smoking behaviour. Smoking behaviour was associated with alcohol intake in girls. Conclusions The HBSC study results can improve the understanding of the development of health behaviours in school children and are useful to educational staff in planning programmes that help school children to adopt healthy behaviours. Only a few studies have focused on the linkage between different health risk factors in adolescent girls and their school background, and none have assessed the interaction of alcohol and drugs use, physical activity and smoking with respect to students' social background. This is the largest study on school children performed in Europe. This study presents the results of the first phase of a European multi-country study on health behaviour in adolescents including 15 429 students from 22 European countries. The study is performed as part of the HBSC study, which is the most detailed and extensive survey on health behaviour in school children performed to date. The present study looks at different risk factors which might explain the wide diversity in health behaviour within and among European countries. This large cross-national sample of school children is the largest sample of adolescents
