A "meteor mesh" system will be used to analyze player positions, run different styles of play and implement special tactics. The result is an entirely new football experience."The result is an entirely new football experience," commented FIFA executive producer Oliver "Nell" Gemmill. "By deep-learning player movement and tackling, the game can learn a player's style of play in much the same way a human coach would. This creates a more realistic environment - players that you know in-game can no longer play a certain way just to avoid an unnatural collision. It helps make the game feel like a proper football simulation." Plays are modelled to interact with virtual environments, showcasing a variety of situations and transitions, including space and time-of-day dependent environments. Attacking players will be able to modify speed, trajectory and power in the second-by-second moments during an attack. Runs will be carried out at incredible speeds, with players making instant decisions on a ball they have never even touched before. "I wanted to build a footballing experience that felt like a virtual reality using the most immersive technology available," continued Gemmill. "I wanted the world's best footballers to be able to move, run, defend, move away and close down opponents - all in near-perfect first person video game-esque detail. Players in the second highest tier will be able to perceive these actions in slow motion, like a real-life camera.

It was our goal to create a football simulation that any fan would enjoy." "Sport is the greatest human art, and FIFA is our moment to shine a light on the game it represents," added Kylian Mbappé, who is the public face of FIFA 22. "Every detail in FIFA is dedicated to the best football experience we could imagine. We worked very hard to make every aspect of the new game feel as realistic as possible. We can't wait for you all to experience it." FIFA Interactive managed the EA SPORTS Game Network on FIFA 19 and FIFA 20. FIFA 21 made history as the most-played sports game in the world by sports media outlets and across the EA SPORTS community. FIFA 22 will bring a new level of life to the FIFA franchise.
