Cephalic phase insulin secretion. Cephalic phase is a physiologic stimulus that can induce insulin secretion. It can be demonstrated by testing with the intravenous glucose test in the absence of exogenous insulin. In the normal human we have shown that the amount of insulin released in response to this stimulus is relatively modest when glucose concentrations are in the range of those that stimulate insulin secretion. The mild nature of the stimulus may explain why the data obtained when the intravenous glucose test is used to study insulin secretion is similar to that obtained by studying patients with diabetes.
