wraps an internal representation of a group of threads inside a process. I'd like to be able to call a function on that object that returns immediately and lets the application continue to run. I would also like to be able to run a callback function on every thread in the group when it finishes running.
This sounds like a job for a ThreadGroup, except that it's too slow for my purpose. I don't want a thread pool, I want a collection of threads. What is the best way to achieve this? I'm leaning towards using a BlockingQueue, although I may be using that just because I don't know any better. Thanks in advance. A: I think a BlockingQueue would work just fine. You can supply your own ThreadFactory to it (which will spawn the threads) and you can retrieve the threads to get to know when they are done. Q: How can I protect electronic components from moisture? I am a really novice hobbyist and I am working on a project that consists in a QFN chip with a 9V battery.
I would like to know how can I protect my components from moisture? A: I am a really novice hobbyist Don't play with the world's most important industry secrets. I am working on a project that consists in a QFN chip with a 9V battery. QFN is just plastic. I would like to know how can I protect my components from moisture? The simplest method is the most effective.
Don't play with the world's most important industry secrets. QFP is just plastic. It depends on the humidity and the air pressure. If the humidity is too high, use aluminum or plastic tape. The humidity is basically the combination of temperature, wind, humidity, and air pressure. If the air pressure is too high

Astronomers have known of compact white dwarfs, but the new super-dense star represents a new model for white dwarf formation. New research suggests that you can learn more about a planet by how it shrinks around its star than by its atmosphere. By measuring how quickly the star dims, scientists can gauge the planet's atmospheric properties. Astronomers have discovered a rare pair of dwarf galaxies, each more than 200 million light-years away, orbiting one another in the first galaxy group discovered in an eclipsing binary system. The system, called FK Comae, is about 4.6 billion years old, making it one of the oldest discovered dwarf galaxies ever, and it may be an interesting example of how galaxies in the early universe might have formed. Massachusetts senatorial candidate Elizabeth Warren may have just endorsed fellow Democrat Bernie Sanders, but she's not hiding her political bias. In response to Donald Trump's comments calling Warren's claim to Native American heritage "insulting," Warren issued a biting response defending herself. "I am an American. I know what it is to be discriminated against because of the color of your skin, and I know what it is to be marginalized and written off. I'm here to help," she said. "That didn't happen in my family," Warren added. "It happened to me. I know what it is to be told I'm not really welcome in a place because of the way that I look." "I learned at an early age that you do what you can to make your own way," she added. "And that hard work and perseverance has helped a lot of people along the way." 6d1f23a050
