Regeneration in the central nervous system (CNS) is a complex event that requires the interaction of biochemical events at multiple levels. The purpose of this review is to synthesize the information available on growth factors and biological factors (neurotrophic and growth factors, vascular endothelial growth factor, oxygen, and therapeutic hypothermia) and their mechanism of action at the molecular, cellular, and tissue levels. From this review, we speculate that the concerted interaction of a wide variety of growth factors will provide the necessary stimuli for axonal regeneration. Biological factors that inhibit the growth of axons may be useful in modulating CNS injury. This may be accomplished by diminishing the inflammatory process that leads to the disruption of the blood-brain barrier. However, it is important to note that they may also possess biological properties, such as vascular permeability, that may result in adverse effects when applied directly to CNS parenchyma. This area of neuromedicine has just begun and information will continue to evolve. Jitendra Kumar Jain Jitendra Kumar Jain is a Muppatt Panni/Mamalik, Shâstr 595f342e71
