Don't be too worried if the samples do not run at first, it is rare for malware to run in a first run. Let's try 1. A few minutes of downtime later, and we are greeted with the familiar DarkComet DMG: Although the number of DarkComet infected computers is small, hackers could potentially use this malware to accomplish a number of different objectives. DarkComet affects Windows machines through a primarily automation and denial of service (DoS) function while also affecting macOS and Linux. According to an Aug. 19 post by Blue Coat Threat Labs, the firm first spotted suspicious activity on June 5 when several Mac and Linux machines were located on the same IP address. At the time, Blue Coat believed a computer that had been infected with DarkComet was conducting a DoS attack against other computers infected with the application. In its fourth annual report for the Middle East and North Africa, the UK based security company, ESET, reported that DarkComet is one of the most popular remote access tools (RAT) being used by a wide array of threat actors. DarkComet used as a RAT is a type of malware that captures the original functionality of the target system and repurposes it to hijack other networks in the vicinity. And it's not just an uncommon tool for hackers, social engineers and information security professionals to use in business contexts, but the use of the malware also increases as a form of political assassination. Within the Middle East, hackers associated with the Syrian Electronic Army have used DarkComet as a weapon to take control of routers and other internet-connected devices.
