awal did not tell me how they calculate music royalties. but their backend analytics tells me how well they are doing at this. they have an algorithm that is a lot more sophisticated than any of the other music distribution services. so they are doing something right. it is not anything special. its just their backend analytics. awal offers the best app for artists. its easy to use and quick to get started. i love their idea of making the app look like a music producer studio. this is a feature that no other music distribution service offers. i love that they can let you create your own music libraries. we are using this review to help you determine which distribution service fits your needs best. if you are looking for more in-depth information on music distribution and digital distribution in general, you can read my books and tutorials on . best features: the arts council of england and the uk government have invested £35 million in the arts council of england's music team program. music team is the go to for all independent labels and artists to learn about the different music distribution and licensing options available. inviq provides helpful tutorials for labels. another bonus is that they are the official music distributor for the bbc radio 1 chart show. they are the only music distributor to receive an official chart show license. they also have a global partnership with google. best overall quality: i personally think that distributory has the best overall quality for labels because they are not a distributor and label services company. they are a distributor. i asked several reps at different companies the same question and they were given differing answers. for example, awal reps said, "if you sign with awal your on our distribution list and your music is distributed to the world. we're also working with google on our own site that is going to launch soon."
