When I first got Photoshop, I fell in love with local memory. If memory cards were cheap enough, I'd have taken hundreds of shots a day. Photographers to this day still use a roll of film together with a camera and a darkroom to print their first set of photos. If we switch to digital, we lose the ability to print photos. If we operate in a memory cards, we not only lose our ability to print photos, but we also give up some of our separation from a machine. We give up the ability to store thousands of dollars of stock without our data being corrupted or stolen. The new Photoshop, like many other programs, gives up that local memory to the point where you barely notice it. Unfortunately, it's an evolution, not a revolution, and Adobe still relies on a hassle-free way of making storing memory cards redundant. Perhaps Signiture is on the way, since it handles all the business side of memory cards, as well. Perhaps Day One is on the way, too. Self-interest aside, I like the idea of a local memory/memory protection solution. You may have noticed that in the new Camera Raw version, if a foreground object is too bright or too colorful, Camera Raw will automatically apply some of that information to a dark gray slider. It will also do the same when things are too dark, and you can add that information to a slider as well. This is where the PhaseOne functionality comes in. If you want to recreate the phaseOne functionality in-camera, you can do it by using Camera Raw 5.0 or Lightroom 3.
