Impact of Depression on Cardiovascular Risk Factors Among African American Men: Results from the Jackson Heart Study. The impact of depression on several cardiovascular risk factors (CVRFs) is understudied among African American (AA) men. The objective of this study is to investigate the association between depression and individual and clustered CVRFs among AA men. We used a sample of 678 AA men from the Jackson Heart Study (JHS) who participated in the 2008-2014 cycles. Cardiovascular risk factor prevalence was determined using data from the 2008-2014 cycles of the JHS; and odds ratios were estimated using logistic regression models. The prevalence of having at least one CVRF was over 70% in all analyzed models. Data indicated a positive association between the odds of having hypertension and having a history of diagnosed depression.

Furthermore, the odds of having diabetes and having uncontrolled hypertension were both positively associated with having a history of diagnosed depression. Adjusted models indicated an association between depression and odds of having a history of high cholesterol, high triglycerides, and low high-density lipoprotein (HDL) cholesterol. The presence of depression was also significantly associated with the odds of having hypertension, uncontrolled hypertension, diabetes, and multiple CVRFs. AA men with a history of diagnosed depression were at risk of several CVRFs.

Identification of these high-risk populations should be considered an important population for early intervention and prevention of CVRFs. The present invention relates generally to the field of optical beam steering devices for scanning light beams, and more particularly to a micromirror device having a pivotable mirror structure formed thereon.

Various optical scanning systems have been proposed in the prior art, including a large array of individually controllable mirror elements to deflect a light beam in a raster pattern and direct the scanning beam to an imaging location whereat a photosensitive imaging medium is disposed. In various optical scanning applications, such as for example, bar code scanning, light beam deflection and steering is achieved by moving a multilayer film structure containing a reflecting metal layer disposed on a silicon substrate. However, in other applications, such as for example, laser printers, the light beam is deflected by deflecting mirrors formed on the
