The chief executive of the UK's Home Office has said that artificial intelligence technology could "transform" its work. Speaking at a House of Commons Select Committee hearing last week, Andrew Selous said that a significant investment in the technology was in the works. Selous said that the department intends to invest £300m in machine-learning, artificial intelligence technology. “It’s important to recognise that machine learning is an active area of research and development. We already use it for a range of aspects of the way we operate the Home Office,” said Selous. “The Future of Work programme [announced in November 2018] sets out the Home Office
