PhotoPaint by Pi Labs is basically a webpage with the latest version of the real-time-typesetting application. The type appears right on the image itself, and its size and position can be adjusted. The best part is that the results appear as flattened PSD files. The most interesting and probably the best solution I have found for working with text on the iPad Pro is Adobe Typekit. It provides a free-trial option, allowing you to try the app before purchasing it.

As for the software, it has really improved vastly. I hate the move to spine feature that is built-in to LR. I really think that they should use a different way to add more content to an image. It seems that when you add a photo you have to constantly move it around on the canvas until it feels right. I just added a photo to a folder and wanted to move it to the left side of my spine. I soon learned that I needed to put the move to spine function in “convert” mode. Why they didn’t simply add the option to move the original photo and the new one separately seems sort of pointless. Maybe it is user error, but if they do this in the future, it will save so much time. Such a logical feature would not have been overlooked.

- Advanced Lighting Effects: The company has created a new version of After Effects which is oddly called Adobe Photoshop CC 2021. This new feature is a solid Photoshop alternative, and it has proven to be more capable than Adobe's paid After Effects CC. This spotty release is a solid change-up for photo editing.
