Lets get this out of the way. Photoshop is not an iPad app. Sorry. I had to say that cause some of your questions were a bit stupid. The resolution is high enough so that you can do everything right there and you won't notice it. But if you want to do some serious work, you're back to the good old days of massive towers and so forth. And the good news is that you can do all this stuff with all the modules that you find in the program under the heading of Comm. and Platform So, how come ACDsee is not included in the original sculptor edition? Why the delay?

You can all be glad that ACDsee finally got included in the sculptor edition. They had to drop x-ray for some reasons. You can get it as a separate plugin for LR, even the x-ray mod is a separate plugin. I wrote a blog on my joy of getting this thing working. Go check it out, it's worth it!

As for the sculpting tools, they're missing a couple of things compared to the LR sculpting tools. All the spots and Corners. And the shape tool is missing a few things. But it's not the end of the world. Go check out the sculptor edition main page for a comparison.

And yup, the "Eraser" brush is missing too. But you can find a nice tool called "Select by Brush". I know, I know... I don't like brushes that much either. We can see that the updates are important at the beginning any release of Lightroom on the official web site, but I believe updates have become so frequent that they confuse users. For this reason, the release of Lightroom 5.0 and Lightroom 5.1 have been moved to an end of this week. For many Lightroom users, the delay of the release would have allowed them enough time to learn and fully understand the updates, especially the new version. But, most users are already familiar with Lightroom, and the last big change in Lightroom might not be enough.
