Photoshop is a very powerful tool that becomes even more valuable over time. 5 is another big step forward in the history of a product that has been thoughtlessly restrained by tried, true, and a bit antiquated practices. The biggest innovation of Lightroom 5, on the whole, is the integration with Dropbox. That's great news, if you're willing to use the application. It's yet another example of Adobe's willingness to release a program without icons on the Start menu or in the taskbar. Even if you are cool with that, it's necessary to manually select apps to sync on Windows (since Dropbox doesn't include creation of desktop shortcuts). As far as I'm concerned, it's not hard enough to set up DataLocker or Synchronizer Pro to work with Lightroom, but the new version has made extending this data sharing a bit easier. This is a long, but well-written, detailed review. I feel a range of different feelings when reading it. Firstly, I agree totally that Lightroom needs something like "Another Fix." Colour management, noise reduction and any number of other possible features that the software has not released yet, could certainly use something like "Another Fix." Besides the previously mentioned features, Digital Photo Professional is a great Photoshop alternative and has some wonderful features. Normally, doing the same job will always be faster in Lightroom, but I often run into issues if I need to access a folder or file that is not in Lightroom's cache memory. This is usually the case if the images are too large for the cache, or if the browser won't let me access the file due to the size. DPP lets me access the file, edit it, and even so, export it directly to the latest Photoshop CC. I am in awe as the image shows up in Photoshop as if I did the export in Photoshop CC, rather than in the browser (I believe this is due to the Adobe Bridge caching). Having said this, I find a significant issue with DPP. The object selection interface is far too simplistic. DPP has some issues when dealing with yes/no selections. In some cases, this works perfectly, allowing me to select objects directly. DPP has some issues when I'm trying to select a much larger area, the area including multiple objects. The interface will only show me the first object I select – whether it be a simple image, or an entire folder, or even a group. It's very limiting and is easy to accidentally select the wrong objects. As mentioned, DPP allows you to zoom in easily and quickly – usually by using the scroll bar. I find using the scroll bar and zoom often to be a better, more accurate way of selecting objects than clicking and dragging. When it comes to the whole workflow, I find the entire process to be extremely slow – especially when compared to Lightroom. Combining the issue with a basic object selection interface is less than ideal, and is a real killer for workflow efficiency.

Throughout the process, JavaScript was checked out and saved to a local folder, and each version of Photoshop with the same dimensions were saved to GitHub . Finally, the two WebAssembly files were compressed and saved to the same folder, and the ratio of their sizes was reported. Even though WebAssembly only offers an immediate compile to machine code after you've written your code and hit the "Compile to WebAssembly" button, the performance gains on this comparison far outstrip the JavaScript comparisons we've seen in the past. This tool gives you the source file to edit directly without calling an extra file that's not even in their format. The version of the white space and the gradient can be adjusted extremely accurate. For those looking for an even more powerful experience, then you might want to consider the upgrade to Adobe's fully-fledged version.
