If you download a program, you are buying the right to use it. It costs money, and it usually includes a media format that you can use to view or edit the final product. Why shouldn't you be able to store that final product with cost of ownership? With Ebooks, this has long been a thing: You can take the format you're expected to use and put it into the Kindle or the Nook, or you can convert it to PDF. That's the way this and every other peer-to-peer technology started, and it's been no different with computers for as long. What I'm trying to say is that training, shipping, or any other costs associated with a downloadable purchase should not exist. If you go to a library and read a book, you're not paying for the book or the author in any way. You're just acquiring the right to read it. However, that's not the way they count on the Internet. I've had to pay to get personally invited to some online networks and services a few times, and that has always been a check mark on the "we need to read you first" list. I think we need to have this conversation again, if we're going to keep moving digital products forward, and I think we should start with people that sell me the software. They are the consumers, really, and they have an interest in what I get up to with it. Nobody should be able to buy the right to a product that they are not allowed to own. If you pay for a DVD, you know if what the disc contains, and there is a fairly simple way to put a charge on that and have it go towards the cost of the media. When I enter a library, I have the right to a book, but the cost of that book is usually free. If the cost of an eBook is $0.99, why should I have to pay for it twice? Why can't the price of the eBook be set the way the price of any other kind of product should be set?
